How easy is it to become an infomercial expert? The answer to that question depends upon how many infomercial products you pick up to review, and how much time you spend with the products. It becomes easier to spot common product problems, and to see how those problems apply to a wide variety of products after you review dozens of products over the course of two months. I like the fact that these videos are obviously recorded by amateur/unsophisticated people who have had little exposure to infomercial products. We receive all types of requests and so have developed a very simple, easy to remember and straightforward motto: "Life. Count. Your. Days." This simple phrase summarises everything we want to offer: life as it should be starting a family should be a great joy life should be lived, not just counted life should be enjoyed, not endured life is what matters, not merely the number of days When you say "life" it is hard to think of anything that is more important than your life, and your life counts. You don't need to have started a family or even have children to have a happy life. We get asked by many of our patients "why is it so important to have kids?" They say this because the cancer has changed their lives and they're very concerned about what will happen to them when they're old. While having children is important to the meaning of life, your life has plenty of meaning with or without children. About ART Knowing that we do not have an exact definition of life, one that would be common to all cultures and institutions, but that is life nonetheless,
